Chris Handley,

Many of the people who know me are aware of my musical proclivities. What people who aren't in the music industry don't know is that being in a musical group is much like being in a romantic-ish relationship with everyone that is in that musical group. It takes more than being passionate and dedicated to the music, liking each other- it also takes a commitment to putting up with one another for long enough to get things done! I know that you know this from your own musical endeavors and experiences, but when I initially met with you I was a bit worried. We'd attempted to redesign the website with no less than three other firms. Our initial contracted arrangement fell through, though not due to any fault of our own, and follow up contractors just weren't hearing what we had to say, not to mention getting the message on the budget that we were working with.

Once we had talked for a few minutes, and I realized that you would easily be able to keep calm and had great potential to herd the cats, so to speak, we set up a meeting with the whole group. I may have put in a good word, but my folks are very discerning and extremely frugal and opinionated. Within a few minutes you had them calm, we had a good frame for how to move forward, and we came to an agreement shortly thereafter. You kept within the range of our budget, you produced a product that was workable, mobile-friendly and that was a strong foundation for us to build upon; and you even set it up so that we could do many of our own updates, which is really a great way to keep the cost down for near-starving artists, such as ourselves.

Now that we've had the time to catch up on our end, we're excited about rolling out the new, improved and stylish website, so we'll be in touch soon to have your hand in ensuring a smooth rollout, which we know from our experience with you should be a cake walk, and we couldn't be more happy!

Thank you for all our your help, support, patience and wisdom throughout the process! We collectively wouldn't hesitate to give your name to our fellow musicians and artists. Knowing a quality web designer is like having a referral gold-card when talking to fellow up-and-coming musicians, and we're keeping that card handy and at the ready.

Best regards,
