

To Whom It May Concern:

There are people who enter a hard season of someone else's life and leave it better than they found it. Not incidentally. Not as a side effect of doing their job well. But because they seem to understand, at some deep and quiet level, that this is what is asked of us: to see each other clearly, and to help.

Jason Wilson is that kind of person.

My client came to him in the wreckage of a marriage ending. She had a daughter still finding her way, and she needed to find something solid beneath her feet. A home that could hold her life as it was now, not as she had planned it. That's a different kind of search than most. It carries more weight. It asks more of the person helping.

Jason met her there. Not just with market knowledge or negotiating skill, though he had both. But with the patience of someone who understood that what she was looking for wasn't square footage. It was safety. It was the feeling of being able to exhale. She found it. A place she describes as exactly what she needed, a home she is "quite certain God intended" for her. A place her daughter can return to. A refuge, in the truest sense of the word.

She told me she felt, during that season, that angels had been placed in her path. She counted Jason among them. She said she would not have a home without him. I believe both things completely.

I think often about what it means to do good work. Not impressive work, not profitable work. Good work. Work that leaves something better than it found it. A home is not just a structure. It is the place from which a life is lived, where a family finds its rhythm, where a daughter knows she can always come back. Jason Wilson helped my client find hers. That's what he does. And it's why I recommend him without reservation.

Warmly,
